Sources for Question 1

Read all the sources below and use them when answering Question 1.

Source A

Debates and Questions in the House of Commons

Attendance at debates in the House of Commons, as any viewer of the BBC Parliament Channel can see, is often very low indeed. With most recent governments having comfortable majorities in the Commons, votes at the end of debates are foregone conclusions in the vast majority of cases. Points put forward by either opposition or backbenchers seem to have little effect. Committees which deal with legislation are controlled by the Whips. Question Time has become little more than an empty ritual, where leaders try and score points off each other and ministers try hard to avoid answering awkward questions. Only written answers have much effect, but they rarely arouse much media attention.
