SECTION A – Research methods and evidence

Answer all the questions.

Source A: Young people and the internet

I decided to complete a case study about 15–25-year-olds' use of the internet. I used two female friends as my sample of young people. They were the same age as me, 15.

I knew I needed to go into detail for my study so I decided that interviews and observations would be the best methods to use. I didn't plan any specific questions to ask, I just had a conversation.

For the observation part of the study, I secretly watched what my two friends used the internet for and which websites they visited. I recorded my findings on my mobile phone.

Source B: Interview results

My interviews were great to do because I knew both of my friends really well. When they told me something that wasn't very clear, I knew from personal experience what they meant, so just wrote that down. I knew my friends wouldn't mind being interviewed so I never told them I was doing a study, I just asked questions when we were talking.

I had to interview Friend 1 at her mum's birthday party, which was busy and noisy, so I couldn't take proper notes. Luckily, I remembered most of what she said so wrote it all down when I got home after the party. Friend 1 didn't seem very interested in what I was asking about, though; her answers were all very short.

The interview with Friend 2 was much more useful because she uses the internet a lot and knows that I like to do this too. Her answers were much more interesting so it was mainly her responses I used to make my conclusions.
