Contents

Introduction .............................................................................................................................................. 3
Paper H072/01 series overview ................................................................................................................ 4

Section 1 overview ................................................................................................................................... 6
  Question 1 (a)....................................................................................................................................... 6
  Question 1 (b)....................................................................................................................................... 7
  Question 2 (a)....................................................................................................................................... 7
  Question 2 (b)....................................................................................................................................... 8
  Question 3 (a)....................................................................................................................................... 9
  Question 3 (b)....................................................................................................................................... 9
  Question 4 (a)..................................................................................................................................... 11
  Question 4 (b)..................................................................................................................................... 13
  Question 5 (a)..................................................................................................................................... 13
  Question 5 (b)..................................................................................................................................... 16
  Question 6 (a)..................................................................................................................................... 16
  Question 6 (b)..................................................................................................................................... 18

Section 2 overview ................................................................................................................................. 19
  Question 7 ......................................................................................................................................... 19
  Question 8 .......................................................................................................................................... 21
  Question 9 .......................................................................................................................................... 22
  Question 10 ........................................................................................................................................ 22
  Question 11 ........................................................................................................................................ 27
Introduction

Our examiners’ reports are produced to offer constructive feedback on candidates’ performance in the examinations. They provide useful guidance for future candidates. The reports will include a general commentary on candidates’ performance, identify technical aspects examined in the questions and highlight good performance and where performance could be improved. The reports will also explain aspects which caused difficulty and why the difficulties arose, whether through a lack of knowledge, poor examination technique, or any other identifiable and explainable reason.

Where overall performance on a question/question part was considered good, with no particular areas to highlight, these questions have not been included in the report. A full copy of the question paper can be downloaded from OCR.
Paper H072/01 series overview

As with previous series, the most successful candidates were those who were most clearly intimately familiar with the texts they have studied, were prepared to discuss them in analytical detail, and when required were able think freshly about them in the light of the question. Both the Shakespeare and Poetry questions carry a high AO2 weighting, and candidates who do not to get down to specifics regarding how writers use techniques to create effects are not giving themselves the best chance of high marks. This is particularly challenging in the Shakespeare question where candidates do not have the text in the examination room; however, some candidates were able to discuss Shakespeare’s linguistic and structural methods with sophistication and nuance. Lower ability responses lapsed into plot recount, and these essays became very general in nature.

Perhaps reflecting the high AO2 weighting on both sections, candidates were often very keen to use literary and linguistic terminology. When done well this gave a real clarity and precision to analysis. However, a basic point made using terminology is still a basic point. An example one examiner noted was typical of a rather unsubtle use of AO2 which was much seen:

‘The transitive dynamic verb “kiss” conveys Caliban’s admiration for Stephano.’

In this example, the fact that ‘kiss’ is a verb is probably not the most interesting thing to say about Caliban’s repeated offer to Stephano, ‘I will kiss thy foot’. This kind of insistent attention to word classes was often not particularly helpful in showing understanding of writers’ effects, and in some cases the word class was incorrectly identified.

Examiners have noted a few areas where written expression (AO1) was awkward or sometimes inaccurate. Specific examples that were much seen included the redundant preposition ‘of’ in phrases such as ‘The play of The Tempest’ and a high number of references to poems in Section 2 as ‘plays’. It’s also worth reminding candidates that a word can ‘connote’ or have ‘connotations of’ something, but cannot have ‘connotations to’ or ‘connote to’ something. While such slips alone certainly do not lead a response to a low mark, they can, in some cases, detract from the thrust of the argument or analysis.

Most responses were well-structured and focused, with effective paragraphing. This was especially true of Section 1, where candidates made good use of the AO5 prompt quotation in the question as the basis of their argument. The ‘deflected response’ which has been noted in previous series was not much in evidence this time. Sometimes very lengthy work would have benefited from more detailed planning before beginning on the answer. In terms of developing a clear structure (AO1), the paragraph opener ‘Another way in which writer x presents theme y’, especially if used several times in an essay, usually suggests a ‘listing’ approach to the answer rather than a developed cohesive argument. In approaching Section 2 candidates are encouraged to be discriminating in the evidence they use from the set poem to support their points, considering they do not have time to perform a ‘line-by-line’ analysis and also make links to the wider poem/collection. A large number of responses, particularly to the Rossetti, were insistently chronological in approach to the poem/passage given.

AO5 in Section 1 was often greatly enhanced by detailed reference to theatrical and cinematic versions, with a real sense of these plays being experienced, not just studied. Named critics (AO5) are most effectively integrated into arguments when what they say is tested against the text itself. There was a tendency to take a critical view on an issue as the end of the debate, leading to arguments broadly akin to ‘critic x says “Angelo is actually a victim in Measure for Measure”, so therefore Angelo can’t be considered “unpleasant”.’ A more fruitful course of action might be to discuss how far the text itself, in the candidate’s view, supports this critical view of Angelo.
It should be noted that context (AO3) is ‘light touch’ on this paper, worth 10% of marks for each question. In the light of this, long digressive contextual discussions are unlikely to help an answer maintain its focus. There were still a relatively large number of historical misnomers, with the use of ‘Victorian’ to mean ‘any historical period before the current one’ being noted by many examiners. The best answers used context as a way of deepening their analysis of the text itself, for example linking the frequent olfactory images in Paradise Lost to Milton’s blindness. Students are clearly being encouraged to consider the contexts of reception for texts and how these may change over time – with one examiner noting this nicely tentative example from a response on Rossetti:

“Rossetti’s freedom may have made a Victorian reader sympathetic towards her as she was never able to fulfil the role of a Victorian woman by becoming a wife and mother, however a modern reader may admire her for putting her religion first and choosing not to marry and they may see her as an empowered woman.”
Section 1 overview

Overall there was a pleasing sense that candidates were engaging with Shakespeare’s work in a personal way. Considering the closed-book nature of this section of the examination there was impressive evidence of close textual knowledge on display in the majority of answers. As one examiner noted:

Able candidates show us that conventional quotation plus comment is not necessary to show familiarity with a text, for example:

"By the time (Ophelia) appears in the flower scene, Polonius has died, Laertes is, to her knowledge, in France, and Hamlet has been sent to England. As such all three watchmen of her chastity are absent."

As noted in earlier series, candidates are advised to be somewhat tentative in the assumptions they make about Elizabethan and Jacobean audiences. As one examiner noted:

Elizabethans and Jacobeans may have lived in a more patriarchal society than our own, but ideas such as ‘Angelo’s attempt to rape Isabella would not have been seen as hypocritical by a Jacobean audience’ or ‘An Elizabethan audience would not have seen Hamlet’s behaviour towards Ophelia as wrong’ are not helpful or accurate.

The structure of the questions in Section 1 helps facilitate candidates’ AO5 response through the prompt critical quotation given. Many candidates made excellent use of these quotations, with their answers having a sense of fresh thinking about the play in the light of it. ‘Deflected’ responses were not common, but were still to be found, particularly in Hamlet answers, with one examiner commenting, ‘essays on revenge in Hamlet appeared a few times, with limited attempts to link revenge to the qualities of an effective king.’

Question 1 (a)

1 Coriolanus

Either

(a) ‘The most significant confrontation in the play Coriolanus is between the people of Rome and their patrician masters.’

How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of the play? [30]

Responses to Coriolanus were extremely rare; however, some highly impressive work was seen. This was the slightly more popular question. The small number of responses seen on this question generally showed a very secure sense of context, such as Roman notions of honour, and showed strong textual awareness, for example in critically supporting arguments which demonstrated both the people’s often rather mercurial attitudes and Coriolanus’ contemptuous view of ‘the rabble’.
Question 1 (b)

(b) 'Coriolanus respects no man except his deadliest rival Tullus Aufidius.'

How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of the relationship between Tullus Aufidius and Coriolanus? [30]

A very little-tackled question. The script extract below discussing potential homoerotic aspects of the relationship between Coriolanus and Tullus Aufidius cogently (AO1) moves from precise consideration of methods (AO2) to consideration of the play in performance (A05). It is a very good example of how AOs can be integrated into a fluent argument.

Exemplar 1

The slightly less popular question on by far the most popular Shakespeare text option. Most candidates found this question accessible and developed well-supported arguments (AO1) that typically offered a 'survey' approach which considered different models of kingship in the play (Old Hamlet, Fortinbras, Claudius) and compared them with the theoretical kingship of Hamlet himself. In terms of context (AO3), a number of candidates saw the play as a direct response to King James; however, the very latest possible date for Hamlet is 1602, making it a late-Elizabethan play. Many candidates effectively made the case for Claudius being a rather effective king in terms of his diplomatic and rhetorical skills. One candidate memorably made the case for Claudius being a kind of decisive 'CEO' who is 'turning round' a failing 'rotten' state.

Question 2 (a)

2 Hamlet

Either

(a) 'The play Hamlet explores what it takes to be an effective King.'

How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of the play Hamlet? [30]
Question 2 (b)

(b) ‘Ophelia’s madness is more interesting to the audience than her sanity.’

How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of the role of Ophelia in the play Hamlet? [30]

A very much-seen response. Clearly many candidates were pleased to see a question on Ophelia. A good number of candidates felt, challenging the question, that in sanity there was actually much that was interesting about Ophelia’s character in terms of what it reveals about Elizabethan attitudes to gender, although some of these contextual points (AO3) were rather sweeping in nature. One examiner noted ‘Candidates who engaged with the ‘more interesting to the audience than…’ part of the question came up with some great alternative ideas about what ‘interesting’ might mean, including ideas about voyeurism, shock, a misogynistic fascination with seeing a woman lose control’. A number of useful references were made to the 2008 Doran production (AO5) supporting the view that Ophelia, pre-madness, is rather more than a passive victim, with a number of candidates recalling the moment from the production where Ophelia undermines her brother’s pious advice regarding the value of chastity before leaving for France by pointing out a packet of condoms concealed in his luggage. Many candidates noted the contrast between Ophelia’s genuine madness and Hamlet’s ‘antic disposition’ and were ready to discuss the way her madness could be seen as a form of liberation. A number of critical perspectives were given, with many candidates making good use of Elaine Showalter’s (AO5) article on Ophelia from the British Library website. The script extract below shows nice ‘light touch’ integration of literary context (AO3) with an interesting and concise comparison of Ophelia’s language (AO2) in ‘madness’ with ‘Poor Tom’ from King Lear.

Exemplar 2

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>When she becomes mad in the second half of the play we start to uncover her true motivations and Ophelia gets far more interesting. We call her mad.</th>
<th>3</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>But Ophelia’s verse is metrically regular and sensibly unlinear, for example, ‘Mad Tom’ in King Lear. One could suspect her insanity is more her own emulation of Hamlet’s ‘antic disposition’. However, most Ophelia is, in her initial madness, interestingly, we begin to understand the fruition of her heart. Her madness exposes her, giving the the confidence and the desire to expose the tricks of the world.</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Question 3 (a)

3  Measure for Measure

   Either

   (a) ‘A play which explores the strengths and weaknesses of being merciful.’

   How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of Measure for Measure? [30]

This was a very rarely tackled question, despite a reasonable number of candidates overall answering on Measure for Measure. Those that did tackle the question often made useful reference to Biblical notions of justice and mercy (AO3) echoed in the title of the play, and by the Duke in the final scene. Higher ability candidates were able to usefully use the verb ‘explores’ from the question (AO5) to think about how the play, in terms of its identity as a comedy or tragedy (AO3) and its presentation of mercy and punishment, ‘explores’ issues without ever reaching a clear sense of resolution.

Question 3 (b)

   (b) ‘Nothing in the play is more unpleasant than Angelo’s hypocrisy.’

   How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of the role of Angelo in Measure for Measure? [30]

By far the more popular of the two Measure for Measure options, and candidates in general were well-prepared for a question on Angelo. Angelo had a good number of astute defenders for his behaviour (AO5) – offering such arguments as his self-professed doubts about his suitability for the role of interim leader, and the way his sexual desires seem to genuinely shock and surprise him. Candidates often talked very relevantly about other behaviours which might challenge Angelo’s hypocrisy in terms of ‘unpleasantness’ – such as the Duke’s abdication of responsibility and Isabella’s arguably excessive piety. However, in some cases these arguments led to Angelo becoming a rather peripheral figure in his own question (AO1).

The script extract below is an example of a candidate clearly very familiar with the play and who is able to make telling use of the contrasting ways Angelo is presented as the play progresses (AO2), with effective reference to context of Puritanism (AO3) and performance (AO5).
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Exemplar 3</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Angelo at the start of the play is presented as a man of stricture and firm abstinence with an 'unsoiled name'; he is shown to not be at all 'tempted' to sin and is similar to Isabella in being described as 'innocently pristine' by a critic. After for the first time, feeling temptation in the form of Isabella, Angelo requires her to lay down the treasure of your body to his sweet uncleanness. Shakespeare's portrayal of the drastic change of Angelo's character and intentions emphasises his hypocrisy further from moving from 'absolute' being called a 'murderer and adulterous thief' by Isabella in Act 5 Scene 1. Shakespeare however does not set up Angelo to be a likeable and amiable character as he is portrayed with puritanical values. In the time Shakespeare was writing 'Measure for Measure', Puritans, although increasing in numbers, were still unpopular with much of the population and would therefore be not received with positivity even before his hypocrical actions. Many productions such as the 2004 Globe Production chose to dress Angelo in puritanical clothing to further drive highlight his alignment with these strict values at the start of the play.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Question 4 (a)

4  Richard III

Either

(a) ‘Family ties count for nothing in the world of Richard III.’

How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of the play? [30]

A relatively uncommon choice of play – with this by far the most common question candidates opted for. There was much good work with detailed analysis (AO2) of Richard’s brutally ironic duality in how he talks about his family to their face and to the audience. There was plenty of evidence of detailed knowledge of the complex family relationships presented in the play – with this often being connected to the History genre (AO3). One examiner noted that ‘the loyalty of the members of the House of Lancaster was sometimes connected to the play’s purpose as propaganda, but the opportunity to write about this, and the play’s loyalty to the Tudors, was often missed’. The script extract below shows an impressive ability to build detailed purposeful analysis of language (AO2) into a detailed argument about how Richard and an audience’s reaction to him changes across the play (AO5) with a telling link to context (AO3).

Exemplar 4

While this action seems shocking at that point the audience are still somewhat aligned with Richard, delighting in his double meanings and admiring his intelligent schemes. However, later in the play Shakespeare shows even more shocking and brutal side to Richard when he kills his nephews. This makes the audience feel uncomfortable watching Richard’s relationship with the children earlier in the play, as he jokes and plays with them, seeming kind, but again uses double meanings to communicate his plans to the audience. For example, Edward shows Richard his ‘flying intelligence and wit, and Richard says, "[Aside] so wise so young, ne'er do live long. By emphasizing their youth and innocence, Shakespeare makes Richard's actions seem even more unnatural and shocking, as the princes are elevated later in the play. Percedocum's-unspeakable crime, saying, 'I wish the bastards dead.' The use of a short sentence on an end-stopped line, and the harsh language make this statement even more blunt and brutal. This is contrasted with Tyrell, who was supposed to be a hardened and unfailing murderer. After killing them, describing their 'alabaster innocent arms,' and the 'prayer book' one was holding, presenting the 'tender babies' as innocent and undeserving of the 'rightful burden' they received. This act by Richard is the ultimate breaking of family ties, and shows him as evil and unnatural. This aligns with the Tudor belief that he was 'God's scourge' sent to punish England for usurping the throne and undermining the divine right of kings. This would mean the play acts as Tudor propaganda, conforming with the view that Richard was cruel and evil justifying Henry VII's usurpation of the throne.
Question 4 (b)

(b) ‘Buckingham is not just Richard’s sidekick – he’s an important character in his own right.’

How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of the role of Buckingham in Richard III? [30]

A very rarely answered question; with most candidates being of the view that Buckingham is mainly a foil for Richard rather than a fully developed character. One examiner noted, ‘candidates engaged with Buckingham’s obsequiousness and made plenty out of his moment of realisation ‘Made I him king for this?’.”

Question 5 (a)

5 The Tempest

Either

(a) ‘The Tempest celebrates the power and value of education.’

How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of the play? [30]

A popular choice of play, with this being the most popular question. One issue was that a minority of candidates did not read the question in detail, saw a word they liked (in this case ‘power’) and responded to a statement (‘The Tempest celebrates power, and the value of education’) which is somewhat different from the one that was in front of them. This led to discussion of issues such as colonialism, patriarchy and Jacobean notions of magic which, while interesting, were often not linked to the presentation of education in the play. It is worth reiterating the importance of being very clear about the wording of the question. Good responses considered the question’s theme of education in an interestingly broad way to include aspects such as characters’ increased self-awareness, for example, Prospero’s enigmatic willingness at the end to ‘Acknowledge’ Caliban and his ‘darkness’ as something that belongs to him. Some interesting work challenged the notion of the play ‘celebrating’ education and questioned whether books should indeed be ‘prized above’ a Dukedom, as Prospero’s bookish lack of vigilance enabled a power-grab. Additionally, candidates noted that the ‘education’ Caliban receives from Miranda and Prospero could be seen as cultural imperialism (AO5) – with Caliban’s native tongue dismissed as a ‘most brutish...gabble’.

The script extract below develops an interesting comparison of the educations of Miranda and Caliban with thoughtful links to context (AO3) and language analysis (AO2). Nb. The reference to Shakespeare as a ‘Victorian’ writer shows that this misapprehension was shared by many candidates, including very able ones.
Exemplar 5

5

Time then proposed that "Caliban is associated with "darness and dirt" opposite to Miranda. Associated with purity and light. Miranda is taught language by Prospero from a very early age.

But it can be argued that she is the most naive one dimensional character within the whole play. In the exposition, we are met with a dramatic figure: a girl who "suffered with those I saw suffer." The hyperbolic language used by Miranda heightens her emotion.

And reflects how a stereotypical Jacobean woman would be expected to be: overflowing with passion. Despite her Western education, she is left in the dark about her past life, and when it is finally revealed to her, she is patronised and treated like a "less of a being." "Dost thou attend me?" It can be argued that Miranda's sole purpose is to reflect the conventions of Jacobean society, as a pure innocent virgin, and a pawn in a patriarchal society (Brett). The value of the education that she has received does not take away from her status as a woman and the inequality within Victorian society. As evidence,
Jameson simply refers to her as a picture of feminine beauty, with no real substance. Not merely would she be considered a pawn in Jacobean society, but she is also a pawn within Prospero's plot to re-attain his dukedom as his marriage to Ferdinand secured his status as they were seen playing a "T-chess game" presenting their purpose. From a feminine perspective, English literature (especially during the Shakespearean era) idealises an oppressive and suffocating image of women, rendering education useless to them.

As they were expected to grow up and marry a man of their father's choosing. Furthermore, Ferdinand and her supposed love, do not stimulate any intellectual conversation or ask her about her previous education. Instead he simply says that "If you are a virgin, I will make you Queen of Naples." Her innocence and purity is of more importance than her knowledge or personal worth; further identified by Freud's psychoanalytical 'Madonna/whore complex'. Despite the 'Tempest' written in Jacobean times, Shakespeare understood and depicted the inequality amongst women and gender expectations. Despite Miranda being an educated female, she was still naïve to the nature of the "brave new world" and forced to accept her oppressive position as a woman in society.
Question 5 (b)

(b) ‘Nothing more than a pack of violent and selfish drunks.’

How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of the roles of Caliban, Stephano and Trinculo in The Tempest? [30]

A somewhat less popular question. Lower ability work used the quotation in the question as a springboard for a straightforward narrative account of how each of the three characters contributes to the plot of The Tempest. Higher ability work often particularly excelled in terms of AO5, with one examiner noting, ‘Knowledge of Caliban gave rise to some superb postcolonial readings and the depth of knowledge about colonisation was often impressive. Marxist readings of Stephano and Trinculo, especially Stephano’s plan to sell Caliban, were interesting.’ Most candidates were of the view that the prompt quotation was a reductive way of seeing the trio and made a strong case for their wider contributions to themes of colonialism, to the play’s ambiguous genre, and as an ironic comic double of Sebastian/Antonio’s assassination plot.

Question 6 (a)

6 Twelfth Night

Either

(a) ‘The so-called happy ending of Twelfth Night leaves out many characters: Malvolio, Antonio, Sir Andrew.’

How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of the ending of Twelfth Night? [30]

A reasonably popular text choice, with this question by some distance the most popular. Most candidates managed to discuss all named characters with Malvolio being the dominant figure in the majority of responses; one examiner noting ‘Malvolio proved fruitful, and analysis of ‘the whole pack of you’ was abundant’. One candidate interestingly made the case that this remark is directed to an audience guilty of taking sadistic pleasure in Malvolio’s suffering. Higher ability responses realised that this was as much a question about structure (AO2) as about character. They discussed the ending interestingly in the context of the genre of comedy and the notion of twelfth night being a liminal point marking the ending of a period of revelry and a return to normality. It is a reasonable approach to contextualise a character’s function at the ending in the light of their development across the play; however, some less successful responses made very little reference to the ending and developed a more general ‘character study’.

The script extract below develops a concise and well-supported analysis of Antonio that successfully links his wider function to his ‘unhappy’ ending:
Exemplar 6

| 1    | Additionally, the character of Antonio, who perhaps stood to most selfless role in the play, is also left out of the happy ending. It is frequently argued he critics not Antonio's love of Sebastian is homosexual and not purely heterosexual (as was portrayed in Branagh's 1997 interpretation). Antonio even says that he 'adores' Sebastian’s "so... that 'danger will seem sport'" and he 'will go'. The term 'adores' is only ever used elsewhere in the play for Antonio's love; for example, when Sir Toby says that Maria "adores" him and they are later married. Additionally, Antonio does not without danger walk through Illyria (this danger is highlighted in Nina's 1996 film adaptation where Viola and the Captain are chased by armed guards at the start of the play). Therefore, in good following Sebastian's own rough and "inhospitable" lands despite the danger it poses to himself, he takes Sebastian selflessly and dutifully. However, when Sebastian is murdered for reason by Olivia, he immediately agrees to marry her, and seemingly... |
| 2    | | 3    | | 4    | | 5    | |
Question 6 (b)

(b) ‘Sir Toby cares more for pleasure than he does for people.’

How far and in what ways do you agree with this view of the role of Sir Toby in Twelfth Night? [30]

This less popular question was often tackled well, with answers showing impressive textual knowledge in supporting their argument. Generally speaking candidates had an unfavourable view of Sir Toby, noting his capacity for cruelty and manipulation in the treatment of Malvolio and Sir Andrew, and how this sits somewhat uneasily within the genre of comedy (AO3). His defenders noted seemingly genuine affection for Maria and, less obviously, Olivia, with one examiner noting that his poor houseguest behaviour was sometimes seen as ‘actually his way of caring for his niece’ in distracting her from her grief.
Section 2 overview

Some highly impressive close reading of this challenging poetry was seen by all examiners. Narrative or descriptive approaches were relatively unusual, with the majority of candidates aware of the need to focus on poets’ methods.

Overall, there is still some work to be done in many cases in getting the balance correct between the set poem or passage and the wider collection or poem. Around 65-70% of the response should deal with the passage or poem on the paper, with 35-30% on connections. A number of candidates were keen to spend the majority of their essay discussing connecting poems with which they were evidently more comfortable.

In a significant minority of cases Section 2 work was considerably shorter and less developed than Section 1. Candidates are advised to spend an equal amount of time on each section, reflecting the equal number of marks available.

OCR support

Teacher Delivery Guides are available for all of the AS poetry set texts. These can be found under the ‘Planning and teaching’ section of the AS English Literature webpage: http://www.ocr.org.uk/qualifications/as-a-level-gce/as-a-level-gce-english-literature-h072-h472-from-2015/planning-and-teaching/#as-level

Question 7

7  Geoffrey Chaucer: The Merchant’s Prologue and Tale

Discuss Chaucer’s portrayal of the Merchant’s view of marriage in the following extract from The Merchant’s Tale.

In your answer explore the author’s use of language, imagery and verse form and consider ways in which you find this extract characteristic of The Merchant’s Prologue and Tale.  [30]

Chaucer was in a clear second place in terms of popularity for Section 2. A striking feature of responses was secure and apposite linking to elsewhere in the poem (AO4) to deepen analysis. Most candidates understood the ironic tone of the extract, with many contrasting it to the Merchant’s very adjacent description of his own wife as ‘a shrewe at al’ in the Prologue (AO4). There was much well-informed analysis of Chaucer’s methods (AO2) – such as the Edenic metaphor ‘paradys terreste’, with many noting the foreshadowing of January’s garden implicit here. Many candidates were keen to point out that the text is a product of an anti-feminist medieval culture (AO3) although often candidates didn’t consider that Chaucer may be satirising these attitudes. Often more successful candidates were attuned to the comedy of the extract in the light of the content of the tale itself.

The script extract below is a very good example of effective analysis of the extract (AO2) combined with apposite cross-linking (AO4) and this candidate even draws on their knowledge of another of The Canterbury Tales:
Exemplar 7

| | |
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>The literary allusion to the 'buxom' nature of 'Gisilfrid' to the Clerk's Tale of an ideal image of a 'virtuous' and 'buxom' wife and is referenced again in this extract. The Merchant is clearly attempting to challenge the image of an ideal wife with his tale and the reference to the 'buxom' nature of women is meant to be ironically used to undercut that sentiment. Therefore, the Merchant uses repetition to undercut his marriage. He also asks a rhetorical question in the way he says 'Who could have 'advised that Adam a wyf?'. Conclusively, the question that will be answered with his tale. The reference to Adam and Eve also implies a 'serpent' must be present (Absence later on) and references 'Jouvene's garden' that is in the place of adultery and deceit towards the end of the poem. The 'perdite terreine' that is said to be...</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>Mortise is also comically incorrect by men. He doesn't want to heave: 'partit.'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>Blissful. In. The 'At Redly, sir' implies a ridiculous patriarchal society where women are expected to serve but this is inherent in the tale. Therefore, Merchant's views are actually negative on mortise but comically point here.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Question 8

8 John Milton: Paradise Lost, Books 9 & 10

Discuss Milton’s portrayal of Death in this extract from Paradise Lost, Book 10.

In your answer explore the author’s use of language, imagery and verse form, and consider ways in which you find this extract characteristic of Paradise Lost, Books 9 and 10.

The third most popular poetry option in Section 2. Candidates generally seemed very well-prepared for this task and confidently linked the presentation of Death here to the Fall in Book 9, and indeed the prelapsarian world before that. A good deal of detailed analysis (AO2) was seen of Milton’s use of prosodic features, such as sibilance (‘So saying, with delight he snuffed the smell / Of mortal change on earth’) which was often connected to Satan’s and his followers’ later humiliating transformation into snakes. The richly sensory nature of the language of the extract was sometimes interestingly connected to Milton’s blindness (AO3). Many candidates had a secure sense of Paradise Lost as an epic poem and discussed features such as epic simile. However, it was unusual, even in higher ability responses, to see candidates engaging with the effects of Milton’s choices of allusion in the extract, such as how the power of Death’s stare is rendered dramatic and supernatural through the ‘Gorgonian rigor’ it creates in the bridge.

The script extract below demonstrates the candidate’s skill in seeing key vocabulary in the passage (AO2) as linking to wider patterns and motifs in the extract and wider poem (AO4).

Exemplar 8
Question 9

9 Samuel Taylor Coleridge: Selected Poems

Discuss how Coleridge portrays the relationship between the speaker and nature in this extract from This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison.

In your answer explore the author’s use of language, imagery and verse form, and consider ways in which you find the poem characteristic of Coleridge’s work in your selection. [30]

Responses on Coleridge were rare, with most examiners reporting seeing few, if any. Most candidates were well-focused on the theme of nature; however, in some cases this led to quite extensive discussion of conventions of Romanticism (AO3) which somewhat diluted close analytical focus on the representation of nature in the given passage. Students were often able to talk effectively about the lyricism of the passage, and good levels of personal engagement were seen. Students had a wide-range of possible comparison poems, with ‘The Nightingale’ and ‘Kubla Khan’ featuring most often.

Question 10

10 Alfred, Lord Tennyson: Maud

Discuss the ways in which the speaker portrays the garden and the flowers in the following extract from Maud.

In your answer explore the author’s use of language, imagery and verse form, and consider ways in which you find this extract characteristic of Maud. [30]

Responses on Maud were extremely rare, however, some higher ability and literary work was seen, as evidenced by the script extract below which displays a hugely impressed knowledge of text and context, linking both into a cogent whole:
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Exemplar 9</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>
| 10. Nature and flowers are used extensively in various ways throughout the poem, both enhancing and highlighting the poem’s hope, passion, and love. Tennyson sometimes flips the focus to emphasize nature to portray the poem’s dark and strange mood, and where nature imagery plays a significant part in Tennyson’s portrayal of the poem’s mental state.

The persona is presented in a way as using nature and flowers to demonstrate his emotions, perhaps because he cannot really comprehend them himself. It is characteristic of the persona to use nature as a way to project his emotions onto nature, and this is evident in the example when he claims that “the lilies and roses ‘are all awake,’ and that ‘they sigh for the dawn and the blue’” lilies and roses. The mention of frequently thimbleberry, the poem emphasizes nature’s beauty and the persona’s love for her. “Roses” signify passion and romance, and “lilies” symbolize purity and beauty as both of these flowers are “sighing.” For Maud, perhaps it can be implied that the poem longs more for her. However, he has only an actual love for her presence and company. In how the flowers are used, personified to be “sighing,” it is perhaps suggested that the persona is preoccupied with the dreamer around them, as he is aware of a time in perhaps should be, and further his preoccupation with Maud’s present may be demonstrated. In the 19th century, melancholy was seen as a mental condition, wherein people were obsessed with the objects of their affection and could think of nothing else. The idea is certainly portrayed in the persona throughout.
the poem, as he constantly describes his desperate longing for Maud. The word "sighing" evident in this line, is used to imply a desperate longing throughout the poem, and the persona projects his emotions onto a cedar tree in asking it, "O, and now sighing for Lebanon! Take cedar me thy limits have here increased", perhaps demonstrating his melancholic longing that he knows he would be better off without. The persona personifies flowers and the garden in the excerpt as devices for him to project his emotions onto, and this enables him to comprehend and understand his emotions better through.

The speaker also personifies the garden and the flowers in it as being in love with Maud, perhaps also implying that the persona's dehumanisation of her. In the extract, the persona calls Maud "Queen rose" of "the labelled gardens of girls", emphasising her superiority in social status and perhaps alluding to Tennyson's own love of pasta. Being, who eventually married a richer man. In linking Maud with flowers and even calling her a "rose", the persona is personifying her very being, as if she, as a person, is defined by her beauty and how much the persona loves her. The passage excerpt begins with an enigmatic, creating an uncomfortable or eerie disconcerting rhythm for the poem to be read in, and this linking the words "blood" and "read", perhaps emphasising how aware the persona is of Maud's life when in the garden and surrounded by nature, as he can even feel her "blood" as he hears about her. However, the silence remains present for a more regalised alternate vision sequence, perhaps implying that
The longer the poem goes in the garden, the more certain he becomes of his thoughts. A poetry was intended to be read aloud, in the Victorian era, and Tennyson frequently read this poem out loud to friends. The alternate rhyme scheme also helps to give tone and changes very musical.

The poem initially feels like it is more about Maud's voice than her singing. It is sung as if it were a song, and one is reflected in the lyrical alternate rhyme scheme he uses to profess his love of Maud. He is also in love with her appearance (calling her eyes 'as blue as violets') and thus in loving her with nature.

Frequently and in speaking of her with a mixture of beauty, the persona turns Maud into a poetic figure, stripping her of her humanity/identity and dehumanizing her. It is therefore uncertain whether the interaction with and the persona have actually happened or is it simply in love with the poetic persona version of her he has created.

Nature and flowers in the garden are also evidence for the persona's decentralized psyche. The poem was originally called 'Maud or Madras' and in the subtitle of 'A Monocrome', it is evident to readers before they even begin reading the poem that they are in the presence of a damaged narrator (a 'monocrome', implies confusion within one single poem, which is a paradoxical idea) this is highlighted in the first stanza of the poem in Part 1 when the persona describes a 'blood-red heart', despite 'blood-red heads' being impossible, as they don't occur.
This is similarly evinced in the extract, which ... the poet makes use of the idea of the "sleeping" to bring the reader back to life. This idea, perhaps, implies the pain the person went through, and implies that he perhaps never living life can be demonstrated most strongly in death itself. "Fused" was a great lover of Shakespeare, and died reciting a sonnet of Shakespeare's plays, and there is evident intertwining throughout the poem between the two: Romeo and Juliet and Hamlet (he even nicknamed the poet "little Hamlet"). Therefore, the idea that the role is strongest in death, and not from the ending of Romeo and Juliet.

In reading the extract, and using Part 1 entirely, it seems to me that the imagery of blood-red roses is...
Question 11

11 Christina Rossetti: Selected Poems

Discuss Rossetti’s use of a playful speaking voice in ‘Winter: My Secret’.

In your answer explore the author’s use of language, imagery and verse form and consider ways in which you find the poem characteristic of Rossetti’s work in your selection. [30]

The runaway winner in terms of popularity, well over half of the Section 2 responses were on Rossetti. As might be expected, the question facilitated responses from right across the range of marks. Higher ability responses embraced the prompt of ‘a playful speaking voice’ with aplomb and explored the poem’s subtle humour and enigmatic nature with precision and skill. Less secure candidates gave little or no consideration to ‘playfulness’ instead developed generalised narrative discussion and often had an insistent biographical reading of the poem (AO3). Candidates were often thoughtful in terms of links, focusing on the relative atypicality of the poem’s playful tone (AO4). One examiner noted ‘links to poems which shared a theme or idea but used a different voice to present it, like the melancholy presentation of privacy and possession in ‘Shut Out’, were fruitful.’

The script extract below shows excellent AO4 skill in bringing two Rossetti poems into interesting and focused dialogue with one another:
Exemplar 10

Winter: My heart is characterized by many of Rossetti’s poems in the techniques used, but Rossetti often employs the same techniques in different ways throughout her work.

For example, the first-person voice responding to an unheard speaker is also found in ‘No Thank You, John.’ This technique allows a woman agency at a time where the ideal of femininity was to be yielding and acquiescent to a man’s demands. The first person in both these poems denies the addressee something.

In ‘Winter,’ Rossetti says ‘I tell my secrets? No indeed, not!’ and in ‘No Thank You, John,’ ‘I never said I loved you, John.’ These first lines begin with the pronoun ‘I,’ giving Rossetti the power in recounting the story, and the strong denial of ‘never’ and ‘no’ give her an uncompromising authority that would have been denied her at that time. The resolution of the question also places the focus on the narrator in both poems, giving a woman agency at a time when they did not even have the vote.
Supporting you

For further details of this qualification please visit the subject webpage.

Review of results

If any of your students’ results are not as expected, you may wish to consider one of our review of results services. For full information about the options available visit the OCR website. If university places are at stake you may wish to consider priority service 2 reviews of marking which have an earlier deadline to ensure your reviews are processed in time for university applications.

active results

Active Results offers a unique perspective on results data and greater opportunities to understand students’ performance.

It allows you to:

- Review reports on the performance of individual candidates, cohorts of students and whole centres
- Analyse results at question and/or topic level
- Compare your centre with OCR national averages or similar OCR centres.
- Identify areas of the curriculum where students excel or struggle and help pinpoint strengths and weaknesses of students and teaching departments.

http://www.ocr.org.uk/administration/support-and-tools/active-results/

CPD Hub

Your route to OCR’s teacher training

Attend one of our popular CPD courses to hear exam feedback directly from a senior assessor or drop in to an online Q&A session.

https://www.cpdhub.ocr.org.uk
We'd like to know your view on the resources we produce. By clicking on the 'Like' or 'Dislike' button you can help us to ensure that our resources work for you. When the email template pops up please add additional comments if you wish and then just click 'Send'. Thank you.

Whether you already offer OCR qualifications, are new to OCR, or are considering switching from your current provider/awarding organisation, you can request more information by completing the Expression of Interest form which can be found here: www.ocr.org.uk/expression-of-interest

OCR Resources: the small print

OCR's resources are provided to support the delivery of OCR qualifications, but in no way constitute an endorsed teaching method that is required by OCR. Whilst every effort is made to ensure the accuracy of the content, OCR cannot be held responsible for any errors or omissions within these resources. We update our resources on a regular basis, so please check the OCR website to ensure you have the most up to date version.

This resource may be freely copied and distributed, as long as the OCR logo and this small print remain intact and OCR is acknowledged as the originator of this work.

Our documents are updated over time. Whilst every effort is made to check all documents, there may be contradictions between published support and the specification, therefore please use the information on the latest specification at all times. Where changes are made to specifications these will be indicated within the document, there will be a new version number indicated, and a summary of the changes. If you do notice a discrepancy between the specification and a resource please contact us at: resources.feedback@ocr.org.uk.

OCR acknowledges the use of the following content:
Square down and Square up: alexwhite/Shutterstock.com

Please get in touch if you want to discuss the accessibility of resources we offer to support delivery of our qualifications: resources.feedback@ocr.org.uk.

Looking for a resource?

There is now a quick and easy search tool to help find free resources for your qualification: www.ocr.org.uk/i-want-to/find-resources/

---

www.ocr.org.uk

OCR Customer Contact Centre

General qualifications

Telephone 01223 553998
Facsimile 01223 552627
Email general.qualifications@ocr.org.uk

OCR is part of Cambridge Assessment, a department of the University of Cambridge. For staff training purposes and as part of our quality assurance programme your call may be recorded or monitored.

© OCR 2018 Oxford Cambridge and RSA Examinations is a Company Limited by Guarantee. Registered in England. Registered office The Triangle Building, Shaftesbury Road, Cambridge, CB2 8EA. Registered company number 3484466. OCR is an exempt charity.