Guidance on delivery for centres

Centres are advised to consider how best to deliver this unit as an optional unit. Tutors must be aware of threading equality and diversity through the whole certificate programme as it is an important factor within the teaching role.

It is beneficial to begin any delivery of equality and diversity with an examination of candidates' own values and attitudes. It is important that the delivery of this unit is undertaken by a tutor who is experienced in this subject as this can be a very emotive topic and quite challenging for the candidate.

For tutors who deliver this unit points to bear in mind might be:

- Consider what reading material can be given to candidates prior to them attending a taught session
- Reading material, research, questionnaires, could be completed along with a professional discussion between the assessor and candidate.
- Guest speakers representing diversity issues generate opportunities for learners to ask questions and make links into their own teaching role.

Tutors should give opportunities for candidates to recognise the importance of their own knowledge in this subject area and also how this links into their teaching role.

Guidance on assessment for centres

Assessors will be able to assess this unit from a candidates report or information and considerations contained within a scheme of work or session plan. It is anticipated that the assessment of this unit will not be in the form of one piece of evidence i.e. report only. Due to the extent of the assessment criteria assessors must consider assessing this unit in other ways i.e. professional discussion to explore a candidate's knowledge and understanding or during an observation of a teaching practice. Assessors must take into consideration 'real evidence' therefore evidence generated in their teaching role may be produced in the form of witness testimony and learners should be encouraged to consider this. Feedback should be given to candidates to explore issues relevant to this unit in the future and to use their reflective journal.

Assessors should be aware of any negativity that maybe generated as a result of examining own values and attitudes in relation to this subject area and be prepared to discuss any issues with the candidate.
